England and her Irish Troubles.

NEW YORK, April 20.—The Tribune says on yesterday's disclosures in Dublin: "These plots were formed in New York. The money was raised here, the agents selected and sent out to do their work of destruction, and they were not Irish refugees, but Americans. These are facts which the United States government will have to face. If there is no law, local, state or national, under which these crimes can be punished the time has come for its enactment. Governments of christendom will be forced for mutual protection to discriminate between political offences and dynamite crimes." Oregonian Special.

This is in the same vein as the London Economist, which says: "It is, we believe, true that England could not compel America to suppress Irish conspiracies, but it is not necessarily true that she could not induce her. The Americans—a grave, kindly and, in the main, religious people—are certain not to tolerate for long an avowed 'war' against a friendly people carried on by their own guests, by means against which not only their own consciences but their own views of the expedient and fitting instinctively revolt. The Irish vote is strong in the Union but not very strong, as the 'Know-Nothing' movement showed, while the Irish irreconcilable vote is very weak. Sooner or later the Americans are sure to decide that 'this thing must end,' and the moment that is decided neither the constitution of the Union nor the laws of individual states will prevent the will of the people from becoming executive. The irreconcilables would then be at war with the whole world, an impossible position, as indeed some of the wildest of themselves publicly acknowledge."

Put into plain English this means that the Economist expects the people of the United States, because they are "grave, kindly and in the main religious," to execute a sentence of Judge Lynch upon the "Irish irreconcilables" without regard to "the constitution of the Union or the laws of individual states." It would be difficult to put into words a more baseless and preposterous expectation than this, or one more insulting in its essence to the character and common sense of the American people. Undoubtedly the condition of Ireland is a source of vexation and annoyance to the United States, and nothing is more likely than that the people of the United States may decide sooner or later that "this thing must end." But it by no means follows that the people of the United States, when they come to this decision, will decide that in order to bring "this thing" to an end the Union must be set at naught in order to put the "Irish irreconcilables" at the mercy of the English government. England may learn something from the story of the relations of the United States with the Cuban insurrection and the Spanish government. The revolt against Spain which began in Cuba in 1868 enlisted the sympathies of many people in this country. As the struggle went on it became quite clear that the arsenal and the treasury of the Cuban rebels were established in the United States. Cubans in the United States organized association and torpedo batteries and gunpowder plots against the power of Spain in Cuba. The Cuban cause was warmly and openly supported not only in the press but on the floor of congress. Spain remonstrated with the Washington government against all these contributions to the rebellion, at least as earnestly as England now remonstrates against the shelter afforded by our laws and customs to Irish refugees suspected by England in dabbling in dynamite. But Spain was told that if she wished to see an end of this thing she must make an end of it herself, by making an end of Cuban discontent and disaffection. The administration of President Grant said to Spain in substance: "How can we put a stop to these conspiracies and these manifestations of sympathy with the Cuban insurgents against your rule excepting at the price of a profound modification of our system of government and of a most serious interference with the individual liberties of the American people? We decline to pay such a price for the pleasure of obeying you." And the result was that Spain found herself compelled to put a stop to the rebellion and to restore public order in Cuba.

It was John Stuart who said in Parliament in 1866 that when the captain of a ship or the master of a school found it necessary to resort continually to the cat-o-nine-tails or the birch in order to keep his crew or his classes quiet and at work, nothing more was needed to show that there must be something out of gear in his management. When a government finds itself compelled to resort continually to force and violence in order to maintain a show of peace and in a given country, who can resist the inference that the government in question does not know how to govern? The writ of habeas corpus has long been suspended in Ireland, trial by jury has been dispensed with, and aliens may at any moment be expelled by the government without a trial. Every newspaper which comes from London teems with offensive comments on the United States and on American citizens. The Economist is a notably calm and reasonable English journal. Yet what can be more offensive than the intimation so broadly made by the Economist that a desire to secure Irish votes is at the bottom of our impatience of England's inability to deal effectually with Irish discontent? As a matter of fact, not one "native American" in twenty has any wish to see Ireland embroiled in war with England. But certainly not one "native American" in twenty wishes to see Ireland compelled by British bayonets to maintain a connection with England which breeds only murders in the one island and dynamite explosions in the other.

Mr. Bright said in 1866 that "if the majority of the people of Ireland, counted fairly out, had their will and had the power they would unmoor the island and its fastenings in the deep and move it at least 2,000 miles to the west." What was true of Ireland in 1866 is not less true in 1883. Americans are not responsible for this and Americans regret this, without reference to the origin of the feeling, whether in tradition of race or in tradition of religion. The feeling, whatever its source may be, is a constant menace to the repose of the United States as well as to the prosperity of Great Britain. The exchange of angry notes growing out of this feeling between Lord Granville and Mr. Frelinghuysen would disturb vast interests on both sides the Atlantic. Americans, therefore, are deeply interested in dealing fairly, calmly and effectually with the difficulties between England and Ireland out of which this dangerous feeling arises. But they cannot accept the excited passions of England as safe guides to action on this side of the Atlantic.

Under the laws of the United States myriads of Irishmen have been induced to establish themselves in America. They have become American citizens. Of course they sympathize deeply with their fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and kindred left behind them. How can that be prevented? Men's sympathies and opinions are free, and the speech of men is free in America, nor can a man's freedom of speech be interfered with here, no matter how violent he may be, unless his speech tends to the injury of some one living, like himself, under American laws. To go from New York to London is not a crime. Assassination is as odious here as in England. Americans are as averse as Englishmen from terrorism and dynamite as means of correcting misgovernment. But what Americans will insist on is that the British government shall summon up good sense and energy enough to restore order, peace and contentment in Ireland.
